Introduction

Dogs have been man's companion for thousands of years. They have been used for hunting, protection and work, but through the generations they have also been transformed into companion animals. Nowadays, almost all dogs are part of their owner's family. This is not simply a relationship between human and animal, but rather an everyday example of cooperation. This has consequences for their behaviour and well-being. Dogs are also dependent on humans, which means that they rely on their human's for food, shelter and care. Many dogs live in the kitchen of their home and give their owners companionship. The effect can be quite strong. How is it that a relationship with one's dog can be so unique and special, such that some people can have such close relationships with them?

I. A Particularly Strong Emotional Bond

The relationship starts with emotions: the dogs love people. They learn to recognize the voices of their owners, their smells and their routines. The dogs can even understand the mood change of their owner. The owners get to learn their dogs behavior. Every glance, posture change, tail movement or barking become familiar. They develop a kind of non verbal communication with each other. The relationship is also based on habit. Dog owners frequently take dogs for walks, feed them, play with them and rest. This creates a routine for the dog. It knows what to expect. Owners associate it to a place of comfort and security. Owners feel comforted by the routine. The dog is always there and asks for no justification. It is always by our side in the simple times, and accompanies us through our difficult moments. This closeness makes us feel that losing our dog is the same as losing a member of the family.

II. The Dog as a Reflection of Its Owner

Factors affecting the behaviour of a dog include the personality of the individual dog, environmental factors, and the breed of the dog. The personality of the dog and the environment in which the dog is reared also play a role. A dog kept in a confined environment will react differently than a dog that is allowed to roam free. Owners also affect the behaviour of the dog. Inconsistent owners and indecisive, nervous or irritable owners tend to have a different response from a dog than consistent, decisive and non-irritated owners. A dog's behaviour is generally conditional. A dog will react in relation to the stimulus cues given off. However the dog will also affect the owner. Ownership of a dog is also a burden. The owner will have to leave the house if needed, independent of the weather, feed the dog at regular intervals, take the dog out if needed and care for the dog. Someone who normally spends most of their time in an armchair will have to leave it more frequently. Someone who normally lives alone may have to share their living quarters with someone else, leading to new experiences and dynamics.

III. Communication Beyond Words

Even with two humans talking, each individual sends and receives a plethora of signals. Some are conveyed by words, but others are sent and received subconsciously, like body language and proximity. The same happens with a dog and owner. A dog may not understand every word it hears from its owner, but it will receive signals. An expert dog owner will often be able to predict something about a dog before it even happens. This is due to the dog displaying warning signs that an inexperienced owner may not pick up on, such as agitation or disinterest. Since dogs will often display agitated body language to convey guilt, an inexperienced owner may fail to pick up on a dog acting out of guilt, even though the dog does not really feel guilty. The owner may misinterpret the dog's body language as feeling guilty when it is actually just acting out of the same body language a human would be. Training a dog is a form of communication between the owner and dog. This involves clear and consistent rules, rewarding good behavior, responding to bad behavior, and repeating commands until the dog understands what the owner wants.

IV. The Responsibility of the Owner

It is okay to have a dog. However, you do not have to go crazy with it. Your dog is dependent on you for many reasons. Your dog might be dependent on you for food or help from a veterinarian, but you also need to provide food and socialization and companionship for your dog. Raising a dog is a responsibility for up to 10 years or more. You can love your dogs but you do not necessarily have to be good at it. You also have responsibilities to other people. Your dog needs to be able to travel through the world without stopping and annoying other people. The dog's owner should know the rules at the place where you go with your dog, know when to control the dog, and respect that other people might be afraid of dogs. As an owner, you need to recognize that all animals are not like dogs, and that they are not comfortable around dogs as much as dogs are around them. Understanding and respecting your dog's limits is a way of respecting your dog.

V. When Attachment Becomes Excessive

Most dog owners have a happy relationship with their pet dogs. However, this often causes problems with the relationship between a pet owner and their pet dogs. Pet owners sometimes treat their dogs like humans, unaware that dogs have their own needs. There are some dogs that get very nervous when their owners are gone. In these cases, pet owners and their dogs are not in a balanced relationship. The relationship between a dog and its owner should be happy and the dog should be allowed to be independent. The pet owner should be able to leave their dogs alone, without worrying how the dog will behave. The dog should be able to have their own space, be loved for what they are instead of what they do. Finally, dogs should be allowed to walk around on their own.

VI. A Relationship That Also Reflects Our Way of Life

Dog and dog owner appear in the film from the point of view. Today, the dog is not only seen as a domestic animal. The dog is a family member who participates in the vacation. The dogs can be seen in the family pictures. The dog also has an influence on the decision-making process of the family. It is a completely new situation for the dog and also for the humans. The dog is connected to the family, comfort and self-identification. There are also many contradictions to this. They buy their dog expensive toys or their dog is the main person in the house. This does not always mean that they are happy. More important than the humanization of the dog is the natural characteristics of the animal. The dog needs exercise, the dog needs rest, the dog needs good food, the dog needs stimulation, the dog needs to interact with people. The best owner is not necessarily the one who spends the most money. The best owner is the one who knows the animal best.

Conclusion

There is a particular and unique relationship between dogs and their owners. This relationship involves affection, dependence, communication and responsibility. Dogs have a very important role in our lives. We also have an important role in dogs' lives. The way a dog lives is largely determined by the lifestyle of its owner. The owner has to determine the lifestyle of the dog. This is the reason why this relationship is special. But the fact that there is a special relationship between the owner and the dog is not enough. There are other things to love a dog. As well as learning about the necessities and limitations of the animal, owners need to learn how to train their dogs daily. Owners must be ready to face the responsibilities of ownership. One has to keep in mind that a dog cannot be loved as if it were a mini human. One has to know that it is not right to possess an animal. Our relationship with our dogs must be based on trust, which has to be acquired through regular day-to-day actions. This is the oldest and longest relationship between man and animals.
